A. Question One: Is Proposition 8 Invalid Because It Constitutes A Revision Of, Rather Than An Amendment To, The California Constitution?	22
1. The Scope Of Proposition 8 Should Be Interpreted Consistently With Its Stated Purpose Of Eliminating State-licensed Marriages For Same-Sex Couples.	22
2. Under This Court's Prior Precedents, Whether Proposition 8 Constitutes A Qualitative Revision Depends On Whether The Denial Of Marriage To Same-Sex Couples Can Be Characterized As A Change In The Fundamental Structure Or Foundational Powers Of California Government, Including The Powers Of This Court To Construe The California Constitution.	28

B. Issue Two: Does Proposition 8 Violate The Separation Of Powers Doctrine Under The California Constitution?	53
1. The Separation Of Powers Doctrine Would Not Appear To Present An Independent Basis On Which To Declare Proposition 8 A Revision Of The State Constitution	53

3. Added Factors Establish That Proposition 8 Should Be Declared To Have No Retroactive Effect On Marriages Entered Into Before The November Election.	71
D. Proposition 8 Should Be Invalidated Even If It Is Deemed To Amend The Constitution Because It Abrogates Fundamental Rights Protected By Article I Without A Compelling Interest.	75
1. Article I, Section 1, Enjoys A Privileged Status In The Plan Of The Constitutional Conventions As The Essential Safeguard Of Individual Freedom.	78
2. The Framers Did Not Give The Legislature The Power To Put A Group's Right To Enjoy Liberty To A Popular Vote.	84
3. The Court Can Harmonize The Constitutional Guarantees Under Article I With The Initiative-Amendment Power By Evaluating Whether A Proposed Amendment Abrogating Fundamental Rights Serves A Compelling Interest; Proposition 8 Does Not Satisfy This Test.	87

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

ROBIN TYLER, et al.,

Petitioners,

S168066

THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al.,

Respondents,

DENNIS HOLLINGSWORTH et al.,

Intervenors.

I.

INTRODUCTION

The writ petitions present an issue of critical significance: whether the voters may, by initiative, amend the California Constitution when doing so takes away a fundamental right from a class of people who are members of a group defined by a suspect classification.^{1/} Although this issue is presented in the context of the right to marry, it could have arisen in the context of other rights and minority groups.

1. The Attorney General is filing identical briefs in response to the petitions in Strauss v. Horton, No. S168047 (“Strauss”), Tyler v. State of California, No. S168066 (“Tyler”), and City and County of San Francisco v. Horton, No. S168078 (“CCSF”). In the Tyler action, his response is also filed on behalf of the State of California as a named respondent.

Petitioners allege that Proposition 8, which declares that “only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California,” constitutes an illegal revision of the Constitution rather than an amendment. The Constitution provides two alternative processes for proposing an amendment: either proposal by petition through the initiative process, or proposal by the Legislature. By contrast, a revision of the Constitution may not be proposed through the initiative process. A revision must be proposed either by the Legislature followed by approval by the electorate or by a constitutional convention. An amendment or revision may be adopted by a majority vote of the electors. Petitioners contend that Proposition 8 proposes the kind of change in the Constitution that cannot be effected through the initiative process.

This litigation presents a conflict between the constitutional power of the voters to amend the Constitution, on the one hand, and the Constitution’s Declaration of Rights, on the other. Our Constitution provides that all political power is inherent in the people, who have the right to amend the Constitution through the initiative process. At the same time, the Constitution guarantees that enjoyment of certain fundamental rights will not be denied without a compelling governmental justification. This Court has a long and honorable record of safeguarding both the legal rights of minorities and the people's right to direct democracy.

The text of our Constitution does not define "revision" or "amendment." Past judicial decisions attempting to distinguish the two kinds of changes have drawn a line that is not always clear in its application. This Court has held that a change constitutes an amendment unless the text of the challenged provision indicates that it alters the basic governmental framework of the state. These holdings suggest that a focus on the allocation of governmental powers is key to determining if a change constitutes a revision. This Court has also stated that, since constitutions are intended to be statements of lasting legal principles, changes should be considered amendments only if they are improvements or elaborations upon existing principles.

Petitioners argue that Proposition 8 must be deemed a revision because, as this Court held in In re Marriage Cases (2008) 43 Cal.4th 757, same-sex couples possess the same fundamental right to marry as do opposite-sex couples and restricting gay men and lesbians from marrying violates the equal protection rights of a group defined by a suspect classification. Petitioners argue that enjoyment of fundamental rights and equal protection of the law are core constitutional principles and that this Court has a unique constitutional responsibility to protect the rights of politically vulnerable minorities against action by the majority. By depriving a suspect class of a fundamental right recognized by this Court, Proposition 8, in petitioners' view, revises the state Constitution by altering its underlying principles and changing the state's basic governmental plan.

The counter-majoritarian function of our Constitution cannot be denied, but neither can the fact that, with this Court's approval, the voters have previously employed the initiative process effectively to reverse the effect of constitutional decisions by this Court. The rulings that have been undone by the voter-approved amendments include decisions rendered in the criminal law context addressing fundamental constitutional issues, such as equal protection, due process, the ban on cruel or unusual punishment and the protection against unlawful searches and seizures. Other, significant civil-law changes to the Constitution, such as the property tax limitations of Proposition 13 and term limits for state officials, have also been deemed amendments rather than revisions, despite their significant effects on state government.

Petitioners' precise claim, that a constitutional change that affects the exercise of a fundamental right by a group defined by a suspect classification is a revision, constitutes a matter of first impression under California law. Although this argument pushes past the boundaries of this Court's existing precedents on what constitutes an amendment, petitioners have nevertheless identified significant concerns about the use of the initiative in these circumstances.

Respondent Attorney General believes that petitioners have failed to demonstrate that Proposition 8 is a revision. But the Attorney General also believes that the initiative-amendment process does not encompass a power to abrogate fundamental constitutional rights without a compelling justification. He believes that Proposition 8, lacks such a justification as determined by the Supreme Court in the In re Marriage Cases and therefore deprives persons of basic liberty guaranteed by section 1, article I of the California Constitution.

Respondent further believes that, even if the Court concludes that Proposition 8 is a permissible amendment to the Constitution, the measure should nevertheless apply prospectively only. Respondent believes that the marriages of the same-sex couples entered into after the effective date of In re Marriage Cases and before Proposition 8 became effective on November 5, 2008 remain valid. To conclude otherwise would violate the normal presumption against retroactivity and harm the vested rights of the couples.

II.

STATEMENT

A. Procedural History

On May 15, 2008, this Court rendered its decision in In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th 757. The majority opinion included the following holdings:

- The California Constitution guarantees the basic civil right to marry to all individuals and couples, regardless of their sexual orientation. (Id. at pp. 810-820.)
- Sexual orientation is a suspect classification for the purposes of analysis under the Constitution's equal protection clause, and statutes that treat persons differently based on their sexual orientation are thus subject to a strict scrutiny analysis. (Id. at pp. 840-844.)
- Strict scrutiny review is required because the marriage statutes necessarily impinged on a same-sex couple's fundamental, constitutionally-protected privacy interest, thereby creating unequal and detrimental consequences for same-sex couples and their children. (Id. at pp. 844-848.)

- The marriage statutes limiting marriage to only opposite-sex couples did not serve a compelling state interest, and thus violated the equal protection clause. (Id. at pp. 848-856.)

Consistent with these holdings, the Court ordered that the definition of marriage contained in Family Code section 300, limiting marriage to only a union “between a man and woman,” be stricken as unconstitutional, and that Family Code section 308.5, which provided that “[o]nly marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California,” be invalidated in its entirety. (Id. at p. 857.)

In re Marriage Cases became final on June 16, 2008. In the five months following the decision, many thousands of same-sex couples were married in this state.

On June 2, 2008, the Secretary of State certified that the supporters of a measure, later numbered as Proposition 8, had gathered sufficient signatures to qualify their measure for the November 4, 2008

General Election ballot. (Secretary of State Debra Bowen, Press Release, June 2, 2008, Respondent's Request for Judicial Notice ("RJN") Exh. 1, at p. 1.)

Based on the semi-official results of the November 4, 2008 General Election, it appeared that Proposition 8 had received a majority of the votes cast and, therefore, would take effect the day after the election. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 4.) On December 13, 2008, the Secretary of State certified that Proposition 8 passed by a vote of 7,001,084 (52.3 percent) in favor to 6,401,482 (47.7 percent) against. (Secretary of State Debra Bowen, Press Release, Dec. 13, 2008, RJN Exh. 2 at p. 1; Statement of Vote, Nov. 4, 2008 General Election, RJN Exh. 3 at p. 7.)

Immediately following the passage of Proposition 8, three petitions seeking this Court's original jurisdiction were filed challenging the legality of the measure. Two of the petitions also sought a stay of the effects of the proposition on the issuance of marriage licenses to same-sex couples.

On November 19, 2008, after receiving preliminary responses to the petitions, this Court issued an order to show cause why the relief sought by the petitions should not be granted and sought briefing by the parties on the following three issues:

1. Is Proposition 8 invalid because it constitutes a revision of, rather than an amendment to, the California Constitution?
2. Does Proposition 8 violate the separation of powers doctrine under the California Constitution?
3. If Proposition 8 is not unconstitutional, what is its effect, if any, on the marriages of same-sex couples performed before the adoption of Proposition 8?

In addition, this Court denied the request of the petitioners in the Strauss and Tyler actions to stay the effects of Proposition 8.

B. Summary Of The Process For Amending And Revision The California Constitution.

There are two procedures for revising the Constitution and two for amending it.

Revision: The Legislature may, by a vote of two-thirds majority of both houses, propose a revision of the Constitution to the voters. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 1.) The voters may then approve the revision by a majority vote. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 4.) Alternatively, the Legislature may, by a vote of two-thirds majority of both houses, submit to the voters the question whether to call a constitutional convention. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 2.) If the convention is called and the delegates adopt a proposed revision, it is then submitted to the voters for approval by majority vote. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 4.)

Amendment. The amendment process may be initiated either by signature-gathering on a private petition for an initiative or by a legislative proposal. The voters may amend the Constitution by initiative. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 3.) To qualify a constitutional amendment through signature-gathering, a proponent must gather signatures equivalent to eight percent of the voters who voted in the last election for governor. (Cal. Const., art. II, § 8, subd. (b).) The Legislature may also propose constitutional amendments for adoption by a two-thirds vote of both houses—the same vote requirement needed for revisions. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 1.) In either situation, the amendment will require approval of a majority of voters in order to take effect. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 4.)

The current procedures for revising and amending the Constitution have remained unchanged since 1970, but they changed extensively before that time.

California's first Constitution, adopted in 1849, provided for amendments and revisions in narrow circumstances, but it contained no process for citizen-sponsored amendments. Article X, section 1 of the 1849 Constitution allowed the Legislature to propose a constitutional amendment only upon a majority vote of both houses in two successive legislative sessions. (Cal. Const. of 1849, art. X, § 1.) If such votes were obtained, it was the “duty of the Legislature . . . to submit such proposed amendment or amendments to the people, in such manner, and at such time as the Legislature shall prescribe.” (Ibid.)

The 1849 Constitution also permitted revisions. Article X, section 2 provided that if two-thirds of both houses of the Legislature believed it was “necessary to revise and change [the] entire Constitution,” the Legislature was required to present to the voters at the next election the opportunity to “vote for or against [a] convention.” (Cal. Const. of 1849, art. X, § 2.) If a majority of the voters favored the calling of a constitutional convention, then the Legislature was required to assemble the convention within six months. (Ibid.)

The Legislature passed a bill in February 1878 calling for delegates to attend a constitutional convention. (Grodin, The California State Constitution: A Reference Guide (1993) p. 10.) After several months of debate, a revised constitution was approved in May 1879. (Id. at p. 16.) The section of the 1849 Constitution that addressed amendment and revision was moved from article X to article XVIII of the new Constitution, and added the following provision: If one or more amendments were to be submitted in the same election, the Legislature was required to prepare and distinguish, “by numbers or otherwise,” so that each could be voted upon separately. (Cal. Const., former art. XVIII, § 1.) Further, the revised Constitution provided for a single two-thirds approval of an amendment by both houses of the Legislature, eliminating the requirement for approval in a subsequent legislative session. (Ibid.) As with the 1849 Constitution, if a majority of the voters approved and ratified the amendment, then such amendment or amendments would become part of the Constitution. (Ibid.)

While the California Constitution was revised in 1879, many believed that the revisions failed to address the problems that were facing the state. (Grodin, supra, at p. 16.) Resentment against the power of the railroads continued to grow, which caused the public to call for more reforms to the governmental structure. (Grodin, supra, at p. 17; see also The Cal. Constitution Revision Commission, Constitution Revision: History and Perspective (1996) at p. 5.) A new political force developed in the state (as well as the nation) and became known as the Progressive Movement. (Ibid.) The goal of the Progressive Movement was to return all political power to the people. (Grodin, supra, at p. 17.) The Progressives advocated for the passage of legislation that would permit

“direct democracy” – the powers of initiative, referendum and recall. (Ibid; see also Cal. Constitution Revision Commission, supra, at pp. 5-6.)

In 1910, California elected Hiram Johnson as Governor; Johnson was one of the leaders of the Progressive Movement in California. (Constitution Revision, supra, at p. 5.) In his inaugural address, Governor Johnson promised Californians he would give “people the means by which they may accomplish such other reforms as they desire,” and stated his belief that the powers of initiative, referendum, and recall would “give to the electorate the power of action when desired, and they do place in the hands of the people the means by which they may protect themselves.” (See Inaugural Address of Hiram Johnson, presented January 3, 1911, RJN Exh. 4 at p. 3.)

By February 1911, the Legislature drafted an amendment to article IV, section 1 of the California Constitution, adding the powers of initiative, referendum and recall and submitted it to the voters for approval. (Cal. Constitution Revision Commission, supra, at pp. 5-6; Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Oct. 11, 1911) analysis of SCA 22, RJN Exh. 5.) Seventy-six percent of voters approved Senate Amendment 22 at a special election held on October 10, 1911. (Id. at p. 6.)

As originally approved in 1911, the initiative power had two aspects, referred to as the powers of “direct initiative” and “indirect initiative.” To qualify a “direct initiative” for the ballot “proposing a law or amendment to the Constitution,” the proponents would need to submit a petition for the Secretary of State bearing signatures equal in number to eight percent of all votes cast for all candidates for governor at the last preceding general election. (Cal. Const., former art. IV, § 1.) The Secretary of State was required to place a qualifying initiative on the ballot at the next election. (Ibid.)

An “indirect initiative” required the signatures of only five percent of the voters. (Ibid.) This vehicle could be used to propose a statutory change, but the initiative initially would be presented to the Legislature rather than to the voters. (Ibid.) The law proposed by the initiative could be “either enacted or rejected without change by the legislature” within 40 days. (Ibid.) If the Legislature failed to act within this period, the initiative would be submitted to the voters. (Ibid.) An additional provision allowed the Legislature to reject the citizen-sponsored initiative and propose its own initiative to the voters, which would appear on the ballot beside the citizen-sponsored initiative. (Ibid.)

The Legislature's power to revise the Constitution was expanded in 1962. Proposition 7 amended section 1 of article XVIII of the Constitution to authorize the Legislature to propose revisions directly to the people by a two-thirds vote of both houses – the same vote requirement already in place for amendments proposed by the Legislature. The Legislative Counsel's ballot analysis summarized the initiative's impact:

Under existing provisions the Legislature can only propose "amendments," that is measures which propose changes specific and limited in nature. "Revisions," i.e., proposals which involve broad changes in all or a substantial part of the Constitution, can presently be proposed only by convening a constitutional convention.

(Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 6, 1962), analysis of Proposition 7 by Legislative Counsel, RJN Exh. 6, at p. 13.)

In 1966, Proposition 1-A reduced the number of signatures needed to qualify an initiative statute from eight percent to five percent of the votes cast at the last election for Governor. (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 8, 1966, analysis of Proposition 1-a by Legislative Counsel, RJN Exh. 7, at p. 1.) The proposition, which was part of a wide-ranging revision of the Constitution prompted by the California Constitution Revision Commission, also eliminated the process for submission of "indirect initiatives" to the Legislature. (Ibid.)

The final change in the procedures for enacting revisions and amendments was enacted by Proposition 16 in 1970. This initiative added new provisions allowing the Legislature to amend or withdraw a constitutional amendment or revision prior to a vote of the electorate, changing the requirements for calling a constitutional convention and selecting convention delegates, and adding a provision that, if two competing measures were adopted by voters at the same election, the measure receiving the highest number of “yes” votes would prevail. (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 3, 1970, analysis of Proposition 16 by Legislative Counsel, RJN Exh. 8 at pp. 27-28.)

C. The California Constitution As A Guarantee Of Individual Rights

California’s original Constitution contained a Declaration of Rights which provided, in relevant part: “All men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; and pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness.” (Cal. Const. 1849, art. I, § 1.)

Our current Constitution, ratified in 1879, contains essentially the same set of inalienable rights in Article I, section 1. It presently states: “All people are by nature free and independent and have inalienable rights.

Among these are enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining safety, happiness, and privacy.” (Cal. Const., art. I, § 1.) This provision has been amended only once, in 1972, to add privacy to the list of inalienable rights, to delete the adjective “certain” before the phrase “inalienable rights,” and to clarify that these rights are guaranteed to all people rather than just to men. (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 7, 1972) RJN. Exh. 9 at part II, p. 11.)

When California was founded in 1849, the protections of the Bill of Rights had been held not to apply to the States. (Barron v. Baltimore (1833) 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243.) Ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 did not initially change this situation; use of the Fourteenth Amendment to apply select provisions of the Bill of Rights against the States was mainly a twentieth century phenomenon. (Falk, The Supreme Court of California 1971-1972, Forward, The State Constitution: A More Than “Adequate” Nonfederal Ground (1973) 61 Cal L. Rev. 273, 273-274.)^{2/}

2. The first decision incorporating a provision of the Bill of Rights, the Fifth Amendment’s Takings Clause, was rendered by the United States Supreme Court in 1897. (Van Cleave, A Constitution in Conflict: The Doctrine of Independent State Grounds and the Voter Initiative in California (1993) 21 Hastings Const. L.Q. 95, 104, citing Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Chicago (1897) 166 U.S. 226.) Even today, not all provisions of the Bill of

Despite the presence of a Declaration of Rights in the California Constitution, state courts in general tended to look toward the federal Bill of Rights rather than to their own constitutions as a source of constitutional protections throughout the first part of the twentieth century. (Van Cleave, supra, 21 Hastings Const. L.Q. at p. 106; Grodin, The California State Constitution, supra, at p. 21 [“For a considerable period of time, the federally guaranteed rights seemed far more expansive and protective than their state analogues. Accordingly, the independent status of state constitutional rights became a largely forgotten concept.”].) This Court was no exception. When the Court struck down the statutory ban on interracial marriage in 1948, it did so solely under the Fourteenth Amendment. (Perez v. Sharp (1948) 32 Cal.2d 711, 731-732 (plur. opn.).^{3/})

Rights have been found to apply to the states. (See District of Columbia v. Heller (2008) __ U.S. __, 128 S.Ct. 2783, 2813, fn. 22 [leaving undecided the question whether the Second Amendment has been incorporated against the States].)

3. See also Sei Fujii v. State (1952) 38 Cal.2d 718, 720 fn. 1, 738 [striking down the Alien Land Law, which denied the right to own land to aliens who were ineligible for citizenship unless their home nations had treaties with the United States, as a Fourteenth Amendment violation]; Mulkey v. Reitman (1966) 64 Cal.2d 529, 532, 533, aff'd sub nom. Reitman v. Mulkey (1967) 387 U.S. 369 [holding that, although plaintiffs brought suit under both federal and state constitutional provisions, “we do not find it necessary” to consider claims under the California Constitution].)

A notable early decision rendering a judgment solely under the California Constitution was People v. Anderson (1972) 6 Cal.3d 628, in which this Court struck down the death penalty as a violation of the California Constitution's proscription against cruel or unusual punishment. (Former Cal. Const., art I, § 17.) Two years later, the electorate endorsed a revision to the Constitution that, among other provisions, added a declaration that the Constitution stands as an independent charter of rights. This provision declared that "[r]ights guaranteed by this Constitution are not dependent on those guaranteed by the United States Constitution."^{4/}

4. This clause regarding constitutional independence was added as part of a major revision that added a specific equal protection guarantee as well as new provisions relating to due process, establishment of religion, and the rights of persons accused of crimes, revised eminent domain and grand jury procedures, and deleted material more suited to statutory enactment. (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 5, 1974), Prop. 7, analysis by Legislative Analyst, RJN Exh. 10, at p. 26.) The CCSF petition characterizes the addition of the equal protection guarantee as an "amendment" to the Constitution. (CCSF Second Amend. Pet. at p. 25.) This statement appears to be incorrect. While the legislation that put Proposition 7 on the ballot was termed an "Assembly Constitutional Amendment," the label that the Legislature used does not, by itself, render the measure an amendment rather than a revision because the same two-thirds vote requirement by the Legislature (followed by a majority vote of the electorate) is required for either an amendment or a revision. (Cal. Const., art. XVIII, § 1.) The ballot pamphlet for Proposition 7 indicates that it incorporated proposals made by the California Constitution Revision Commission. (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 5, 1974), argument in favor of Prop. 7, RJN Exh. 10, at p. 28.) Thus, Proposition 7 was a revision because of the quantity of the changes that it made. Perhaps for this reason, the Legislative Analyst's ballot analysis described the initiative as a revision. (Ibid.)

(Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. 1974, Prop. 7, RJN Exh. 10, at p. 72 [adding Cal. Const., art. I, § 24].)

This Court later articulated its own vision of the California Constitution as an independent charter of rights. In People v. Brisendine (1975) 13 Cal.3d 528, the Court applied the California Constitution to invalidate a search by police that would have been legal under the Supreme Court's Fourth Amendment precedents. (Id. at p. 552.) In rejecting the argument that federal precedent should be followed, this Court stated:

This court has always assumed the independent vitality of our state Constitution. In the search and seizure area our decisions have often comported with federal law, yet there never has been any question that this similarity was a matter of choice and not compulsion. [¶] . . . [¶] [T]he California Constitution is, and always has been, a document of independent force. Any other result would contradict not only the most fundamental principles of federalism but also the historic bases of state charters. It is a fiction too long accepted that provisions in state constitutions textually identical to the Bill of Rights were intended to mirror their federal counterpart. The lesson of history is otherwise: the Bill of Rights was based upon the corresponding provisions of the first state constitutions, rather than the reverse.

The Court's interpretations of the California Constitution have sometimes prompted initiatives amending the Constitution to trump the effect of judicial decisions. The result in Anderson was undone by a 1972 initiative that added section 27 to article I of the California Constitution. It provided, in part, that the death penalty “shall not be deemed to be, or to constitute, the infliction of cruel or unusual punishments within the meaning of Article I, Section 6 nor shall such punishment for such offenses be deemed to contravene any other provision of this constitution.” (Cal. Const., art I, § 27; see People v. Frierson (1979) 25 Cal.3d 142, 185 [“The clear intent of the electorate in adopting section 27 was to circumvent Anderson by restoring the death penalty to the extent permitted by the federal constitution.”^{5/}].) Similarly, Brisendine’s interpretation of the state constitutional protection against unlawful searches was effectively reversed by Proposition 8 in 1982. (In re Lance

5. The lead opinion in Frierson addressing whether the 1972 initiative adding section 27 to article I was a revision or an amendment was joined by three justices. Justice Mosk, joined by Justice Newman, filed a concurrence in the judgment stating that, despite his personal dismay at the voters’ decision to reinstate the death penalty, he was “compelled to conclude that the 1977 death penalty legislation does not violate the California Constitution.” (Id. at p. 189 (conc. opn. of Mosk, J.)) Although Justice Mosk later characterized this holding as dicta by a plurality of the Court (Legislature v. Eu (1991) 54 Cal.3d 492, 541 (conc. & dis. opn. of Mosk, J.) [stating that in Frierson “a plurality of the court considered in dictum whether a 1972 initiative measure was amendatory or revisory”]; see also Mosk, Raven and Revision (1991) 25 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1, 7), this Court has cited and discussed Frierson as a majority holding. (Raven v. Deukmejian (1990) 52 Cal.3d 336, 355 [concluding that in Frierson “we upheld a provision which in essence required California courts in capital cases to apply the state cruel or unusual punishment clause consistently with the federal Constitution.”].) Thus, the conclusion that the death penalty initiative was an amendment is properly viewed as a majority holding.

W. (1985) 37 Cal.3d 873, 879 [holding that the initiative abrogated both the “vicarious exclusionary rule” and “a defendant’s right to object to and suppress evidence seized in violation of the California, but not the federal, Constitution.”].)

III.

ARGUMENT

A. Question One: Is Proposition 8 Invalid Because It Constitutes A Revision Of, Rather Than An Amendment To, The California Constitution?

1. The Scope Of Proposition 8 Should Be Interpreted Consistently With Its Stated Purpose Of Eliminating State-licensed Marriages For Same-Sex Couples.

The scope of Proposition 8 should neither be overstated nor understated. There can be no minimizing the fact that the initiative is intended to take a legal right away from same-sex couples. And there can be no discounting the depth of emotion on all sides of the issue. As a matter of legal interpretation, however, “the aim . . . is to ‘determine and effectuate the intent of those who enacted the constitutional provision at issue.’” (Silicon Valley Taxpayers Assn. v. Santa Clara County Open Space Auth. (2008) 44 Cal.4th 431, 444 (citation omitted).) “If the language is clear and unambiguous, the plain meaning governs. . . . But if the language is ambiguous, [the Court] consider[s] extrinsic evidence in determining voter intent, including the Legislative Analyst’s analysis and ballot arguments for and against the initiative.” (Id. at pp. 444-445 (citations omitted).) When interpreting the meaning of an initiative, a step that must logically precede determining whether or not it is constitutional, the goal is that “the voters should get what they enacted, not more and not less.” (Strong v. State Bd. of Equalization (2007) 155 Cal.App.4th 1182, 1195, quoting Hodges v. Superior Court (1999) 21 Cal.4th 109, 114.)

Here, the plain language of Proposition 8 is relatively straightforward. Indeed, the exact words were used in former Family Code section 308.5, which was previously struck down as unconstitutional. Nevertheless, assessment of the legal effect of Proposition 8 requires considering its impact on the holding of In re Marriage Cases. (Brown v. Merlo (1973) 8 Cal.3d 855, 862 [determining constitutionality of a law requires consideration of the entire legal context].)

While the decision in In re Marriage Cases compelled the state, acting through its 58 counties,⁶ to take the historic step of providing

6. Counties are legal subdivisions of the state. (Cal. Const., art. XI, § 1, subd. (a).) County clerks and county recorders are the local officials who have been granted authority with regard to marriage licenses and certificates. (Lockyer v. City and County of San Francisco (2004) 33 Cal.4th 1055, 1080; see also Fam.

marriage for same-sex couples, the legal holding was both precise and narrow. This Court was confronted by a situation not present in most other states: the existence of a statutory arrangement in which same-sex couples were barred from marrying but were allowed to enter into “an officially recognized family relationship that affords all of the significant legal rights and obligations traditionally associated with marriage” by registering as domestic partners.^{7/} (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at pp. 779-780.)

In response to the Attorney General’s argument that the difference in terminology between the two institutions did not rise to the level of constitutional significance, the Court stated that it “ha[d] no occasion in this case to determine whether the state constitutional right to marry necessarily affords all couples the constitutional right to designate Code, § 350, Health & Saf. Code, § 102285.) The Director of the California Department of Public Health, who is designated as the State Registrar of Vital Statistics, is required to prescribe and furnish forms for use in registering marriages and to supervise local registrars in the use of those forms. (Health & Saf. Code, §§ 102175, 102100, 102180, 102200.) Thus, while Dr. Horton and Dr. Scott have been named as respondents in this action, petitioners do not allege that either of them took any step to enforce Proposition 8. Indeed, since marriage licensing occurs on the county level, no such allegation could be logically made.

7. This Court observed that domestic partnerships provided same-sex couples with the opportunity to have “virtually all of the same substantive legal benefits and privileges” that opposite-sex married couples had. (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at p. 779.) The legal differences between the two institutions were described as “relatively minor.” (Id. at p. 779 fn. 2.)

their official family relationship a ‘marriage,’ or whether . . . the Legislature would not violate a couple’s right to marry if . . . it were to assign a name other than marriage as the official designation of the family relationship for all couples.” (Id. at p. 830.) Since same-sex-couples were being treated differently than opposite-sex couples, the Court did “not decide . . . whether the name ‘marriage’ is invariably a core element of the state constitutional right to marry. . . .” (Id. at p. 783.) For the purpose of deciding the Marriage Cases, it was sufficient to conclude that “assigning a different designation for the family relationship of same-sex couples while reserving the historic designation of ‘marriage’ exclusively for opposite-sex couples poses at least a serious risk of denying the family relationship of same-sex couples . . . equal dignity and respect.” (Ibid.)

By way of contrast to the constitutional right to marry, Proposition 8 addresses marriage as a government licensing scheme. It addresses the issue of which kinds of relationships will be defined as “marriages” and authorized by law. It leaves unaddressed the central part of this Court’s holding: that same-sex couples possess a constitutional right to form a family that is recognized by the state and given dignity and respect equal to that given to the relationships of opposite-sex couples—without reference to the terminology employed by the state to describe those relationships.

Because this interpretation of Proposition 8 is supported by the plain words of the initiative, there is no need to consult its legislative history for interpretative guidance. Ballot materials, however, also support a limited view of the scope of Proposition 8. The proponents of Proposition 8 argued that their purpose was to “restore the definition of marriage” in response to this Court’s decision and to “protect[] our children from being taught in public schools that ‘same-sex marriage’ is the same as traditional marriage.”^{8/} (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 4, 2008), Argument in Favor of Proposition 8, RJN Exh. 14, p. 56.) The proponents further argued that “[s]ome will try to tell you that Proposition 8 takes away legal rights of gay domestic partnerships. That is false. Proposition 8 DOES NOT take away any of those rights and does not interfere with gays living the lifestyle they choose.” (Ibid.) Thus, the proponents cannot reasonably contend that their initiative was intended to do anything more than to restore a statutory definition, although as part of the Constitution. There can be little question that the holdings of this Court regarding the rights of same-sex couples to have officially-recognized family relationships—that are due the same stature and respect as marriages—remain in effect after Proposition 8. Nor does Proposition 8 change this Court’s holding “that statutes imposing differential treatment on the basis of sexual orientation should be viewed as constitutionally suspect under the California Constitution’s equal protection clause.” (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at p. 843.)

8. The ballot pamphlet states that the initiative “overturns the outrageous court decision of four activist Supreme Court judges [sic] who ignored the will of the people.” (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 4, 2008), Argument in Favor of Proposition 8, Exh. 14, at p. 56 (emphasis original).) While Proposition 8 by its plain terms changes the Constitution to counteract the prospective legal effect of In re Marriage Cases, it does not literally overturn or reverse the decision. Nor does the initiative address what can or cannot be taught about marriage in the public school system.

Petitioners assert that Proposition 8 has undermined the authority of this Court either to interpret the Constitution or to protect the rights of minorities. (Strauss Amend. Pet., ¶ 21, p. 8, p. 17.) Such effects appear to exceed the legal effect of the initiative when considered in light of In re Marriage Cases. That decision has not literally been “vetoed” by the electorate.⁹ (CCSF Second Amend. Pet. at p. 22.) Nor does Proposition 8 “strip the Petitioners and thousands like them of fundamental legal rights and attributes traditionally associated with marriage that are integral to personal liberty and personal autonomy.” (Tyler Amend. Pet.,

9. Petitioners appear to assert that the electorate enacted Proposition 8 with intent to harm gay men and lesbians. This Court, however, concluded that Proposition 22, was not enacted with “an invidious intent or purpose.” (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at p. 856, fn. 73.)

¶ 11, p. 5) To the contrary, the Domestic Partnership Act (Fam. Code, §§ 297, et seq.) continues to exist, as does the State’s “obligat[ion] to take affirmative action to grant official, public recognition to [a same-sex] couple’s relationship as a family” (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at pp. 819-820.)

2. Under This Court’s Prior Precedents, Whether Proposition 8 Constitutes A Qualitative Revision Depends On Whether The Denial Of Marriage To Same-Sex Couples Can Be Characterized As A Change In The Fundamental Structure Or Foundational Powers Of California Government, Including The Powers Of This Court To Construe The California Constitution.

“Although the California Constitution does not define the terms ‘amendment’ or ‘revision,’ the courts have developed some guidelines helpful in resolving the . . . issue.” (Raven v. Deukmejian, supra, 52 Cal.3d at p. 350.) “[R]evision/amendment analysis has a dual aspect, requiring [a court] to examine both the quantitative and qualitative effects of the measure on our constitutional scheme.” (Ibid.; see also Amador Valley Joint Union High Sch. Dist. v. State Bd. of Equalization (1978) 22 Cal.3d 208, 223 (Amador Valley) [“. . . our analysis in determining whether a particular constitutional enactment is a revision or an amendment must be both quantitative and qualitative in nature.”])

“Substantial changes in either respect could amount to a revision.” (Ibid.)

“For example, an enactment which is so extensive in its provisions as to change directly the ‘substantial entirety’ of the Constitution by the deletion or alteration of numerous existing provisions may well constitute a revision thereof. However, even a relatively simple enactment may accomplish such far reaching changes in the nature of our basic governmental plan as to amount to a revision also.” (Amador Valley, supra, 22 Cal.3d at p. 223.) “Thus, a constitutional ‘revision’ need not involve widespread deletions, additions and amendments affecting a host of constitutional provisions and resulting in a quantitative revision.” (Legislature v. Eu, supra, 54 Cal.3d at p. 506.)

Petitioners do not argue that Proposition 8, which addresses only one issue, is quantitatively a revision. The only case that ever struck down an initiative on a quantitative as well as a qualitative basis, McFadden v. Jordan (1948) 32 Cal.2d 330, involved an initiative that would have repealed or altered 15 of the 25 articles of the Constitution and substantially curtailed the functions of both the legislative and the judicial branches. (Id. at p. 345)¹⁰ It therefore sheds little light on the issues raised by the petitions.

More relevant to the question presented here are a series of decisions, beginning with Amador Valley and People v. Frierson, and culminating in Raven v. Deukmejian and Legislature v. Eu, that have considered whether initiatives making significant changes in our Constitution were qualitative revisions.

In Amador Valley, this Court upheld Proposition 13, the Jarvis-Gann property tax initiative, as a valid constitutional amendment. In addition to declining to find that Proposition 13 was a revision by reason of its quantitative effect, this Court held that the measure's qualitative effect on the state's basic governmental plan was not as "fundamentally disruptive" as its opponents suggested. (Amador Valley, supra, 22 Cal.3d at p. 224.) Proposition 13 did not effect such changes either by causing loss of home rule on the part of local governments or by changing from a "republican" to a "democratic" form of government. (Id. at pp. 224-228.)

10. If an initiative like the one at issue in McFadden were proposed today, it would probably be held to violate the single-subject rule for initiatives. (Cal. Const., art. II, § 8, subd. (d).) That rule was adopted in 1948, "possibly in response to the multifaceted initiative measure" struck down in McFadden. (Amador Valley, supra, 22 Cal.3d at p. 229.)

Therefore, this Court concluded that Proposition 13 “may fairly may be deemed a constitutional amendment, not a revision.” (Id. at p. 229.)

One year later, in People v. Frierson, this Court rejected constitutional challenges to a California constitutional amendment restoring the death penalty. (People v. Frierson, supra, 25 Cal.3d 142.) The Frierson defendant, who had been convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to death, challenged his sentence in part on the ground that the 1972 initiative adding article I, section 27 to the California Constitution in response to People v. Anderson, supra, 6 Cal.3d 628, was an improper constitutional revision. (Id. at p. 186.) Noting Amador Valley’s admonition concerning “far reaching changes in the nature of our basic governmental plan,” Frierson held that section 27 “accomplishes no such sweeping result”:

As we have explained, we retain broad powers of judicial review of death sentences to assure that each sentence has been properly and legally imposed and to safeguard against arbitrary or disproportionate treatment. In addition, we possess unrestricted authority to measure and appraise the constitutionality of the death penalty under the federal Constitution, in accordance with the guidelines established by the United States Supreme Court. We are thus led to the conclusion that the constitutional change worked by section 27 is not so broad as to constitute a fundamental constitutional revision.

After Frierson came a trio of cases challenging initiatives that were enacted in response to holdings by this Court. In Brosnahan v. Brown (1982) 32 Cal.3d 236, this Court upheld in its entirety another crime measure, Proposition 8, known as “The Victim’s Bill of Rights,” against a challenge that it effected an invalid constitutional revision. Among other things, that initiative added section 28 to article I of the state Constitution. (Id. at p. 242.) In new section 28, the voters adopted provisions governing restitution for crime victims, safe schools, truth-in-evidence (requiring that relevant evidence shall not be excluded in any criminal proceeding), and use of prior felony convictions for impeachment and sentence enhancement. (Id. at pp. 242-243.)

After holding that these provisions did not amount to a quantitative revision, this Court also found that they did not sufficiently change the state’s basic governmental plan to amount to a qualitative revision: “From a qualitative point of view, while Proposition 8 does accomplish substantial changes in our criminal justice system, even in combination these changes fall considerably short of constituting ‘such far reaching changes in the nature of our basic governmental plan as to amount to a revision’” (Brosnahan v. Brown, supra, 32 Cal.3d at p. 260, quoting Amador Valley, supra, 22 Cal.3d at p. 223.) Finding that “nothing contained in Proposition 8 necessarily or inevitably will alter the basic governmental framework set forth in our Constitution[.]” this Court held that the measure “did not accomplish a ‘revision’ of the Constitution within the meaning of article XVIII.” (Id. at p. 261.)

Subsequently, section 28(d), the truth-in-evidence provision, was upheld against a further attack that it amounted to an improper revision of the state Constitution. (In re Lance W., supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 891.) In Lance W., this Court saw no reason to depart from its Brosnahan decision upholding Proposition 8 in its entirety. (Ibid.) “The adoption of section 28(d) . . . cannot be considered such a sweeping change either in the distribution of powers made in the organic document or in the powers which it vests in the judicial branch as to constitute a revision of the Constitution within the contemplation of article XVIII.” (Id. at p. 892; see also People v. May (1988) 44 Cal.3d 309, 311 [holding that the “truth in evidence” provision had abrogated the prior holding of People v. Disbrow (1976) 16 Cal.3d 101, that statements made in violation of Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 384 U.S. 436, were inadmissible for impeachment purposes].)

Brosnahan and Lance W. were followed by Raven v. Deukmejian, supra, 52 Cal.3d. 336, which, other than McFadden, is the only case ever to strike down a portion of an initiative on the ground that it was a qualitative revision. The petitioners in Raven challenged Proposition 115, the “Crime Victim’s Justice Reform Act,” as an invalid revision. Proposition 115, as it was addressed by this Court, could be divided into two parts. First, the initiative amended the declaration in section 24 of Article I that the California Constitution would be interpreted independently from the United States Constitution. Proposition 115 added language to this provision, which stated:

In criminal cases the rights of a defendant to equal protection of the laws, to due process of law, to the assistance of counsel, to be personally present with counsel, to a speedy public trial, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to confront the witnesses against him or her, to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, to privacy, to not be compelled to be a witness against himself or herself, to not be placed twice in jeopardy for the same offense, and not to suffer the imposition of cruel or unusual punishment, shall be construed by the courts of this state in a manner consistent with the Constitution of the United States. This Constitution shall not be construed by the courts to afford greater rights to criminal defendants than those afforded by the Constitution of the United States, nor shall it be construed to afford greater rights to minors in juvenile proceedings on criminal causes than those afforded by the Constitution of the United States.

Separate from this omnibus provision, Proposition 115 also added constitutional provisions denying preliminary hearings to defendants charged by indictment, providing that the people have a rights to due process and a speedy and public trial, setting forth rules governing joinder and severance of criminal cases, declaring hearsay testimony admissible at preliminary hearings, and calling for reciprocal discovery in criminal cases, as well as making various changes to the Penal Code. (Id. at pp. 342-346.)

The Raven Court held that the omnibus provision of Proposition 115 was a revision. As amended by Proposition 115, section 24 added language that “[i]n essence and practical effect . . . would vest all judicial interpretive power, as to fundamental criminal defense rights, in the United States Supreme Court.” (Id. at p. 352.) “California courts in criminal cases would no longer have authority to interpret the state Constitution in a manner more protective of defendants’ rights than extended by the federal Constitution, as construed by the United States Supreme Court.” (Id. at p. 352.) This change “would substantially alter the substance and integrity of the state Constitution as a document of independent force and effect.” (Ibid.) “It substantially alters the preexisting constitutional scheme or framework heretofore extensively and repeatedly used by courts in interpreting and enforcing state constitutional protections.” (Id. at p. 354.) Based on these effects, “new article I, section 24, represents an invalid revision of the California Constitution.” (Id. at p. 355.)

Significantly, the Raven Court distinguished this provision from the other constitutional and statutory changes wrought by Proposition 115. It stated that “[t]he additional constitutional changes cannot be deemed matters which standing alone, or in the aggregate, substantially change our preexisting governmental framework.” (Ibid.) For this reason, the Court severed the omnibus provision of Proposition 115, which it invalidated as a revision, while upholding the remainder of the initiative. (Id. at pp. 355-356.)

One year after Raven came Legislature v. Eu, which concerned Proposition 140, known as the “Political Reform Act of 1990.” Among other things, Proposition 140 imposed term limitations on state legislators and constitutional officers, placed budgetary limitations on the Legislature and restricted legislators’ pension rights. (Legislature v. Eu, supra, 54 Cal.3d at pp. 501-503.) In rejecting arguments that these changes amounted to a constitutional revision, this Court said that “a qualitative revision includes one that involves a change in the basic plan of California government, i.e., a change in its fundamental structure or the foundational powers of its branches.” (Id. at p. 509.) No such change had been made because “the basic and fundamental structure of the Legislature as a representative branch of government is left substantially unchanged by Proposition 140.” (Id. at p. 508.)

Further, Eu held that a revision must appear on the face of the measure: “Our prior decisions have made it clear that to find such a revision, it must necessarily or inevitably appear from the face of the challenged provision that the measure will substantially alter the basic governmental framework set forth in our Constitution.” (Legislature v. Eu, supra, 54 Cal.3d. at p. 510.) Proposition 140 failed this facial test because “the assertedly momentous consequences to our governmental scheme are largely speculative ones, dependent on a number of as yet unproved premises.” (Id. at p. 508.) Therefore, “[r]esolving, as we must, all doubts in favor of the initiative process,” this Court concluded “that nothing on the face of Proposition 140 effects a constitutional revision.” (Id. at p. 512; see also Rippon v. Bowen (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 1308, 1315-1321 [following Eu to hold that term limits initiative was not a constitutional revision].)

More recently, in Professional Engineers in California Government v. Kempton (2007) 40 Cal.4th 1016 (Professional Engineers), this Court followed Amador Valley in upholding Proposition 35, which removed a constitutional restriction on the ability of governmental entities to contract with private firms for architectural and engineering services on public works projects. (Id. at p. 1023.) Proposition 35 was not a qualitative revision in that it did not “usurp the Legislature's plenary authority to regulate private contracting by public agencies in a global sense” and the Legislature retained some authority to amend the initiative by statute. (Id. at p. 1047.) This Court could not agree “that Proposition 35 creates such ‘far reaching changes to our basic governmental plan as to amount to a revision.’” (Ibid., quoting Amador Valley, supra, 22 Cal.3d at p. 223.)

3. Whether Petitioners’ Theory, If Accepted, Would Expand The Definition Of A Constitutional Revision Beyond This Court’s Existing Jurisprudence And The Possible Effect On Existing Constitutional Provisions Enacted By Initiative Amendments.

In urging this Court to find that Proposition 8 impermissibly revises the state Constitution, petitioners make two arguments. First, they contend that Proposition 8 alters the underlying principles on which the Constitution is based by severely compromising the core constitutional principle of equal protection and by depriving a vulnerable minority of a fundamental right. Second, they assert that the measure effects a far-reaching change to the nature of California's governmental plan by preventing California courts from exercising their traditional function of protecting the equal protection rights of a minority defined by a suspect classification. (Strauss Amended Pet., p. 8, ¶ 21; see CCSF Second Amended Pet., pp.24-35; see Tyler Amended Pet., pp. 7-8, ¶¶ 17-19.) Each of these assertions, and the questions they raise about the impact on existing initiatives, can be discussed in turn.

a. Whether Proposition 8 Should Be Considered A Revision Because It Takes Away Fundamental Constitutional Rights From A Minority Defined By A Suspect Classification.

With respect to equal protection and fundamental rights, the Strauss petitioners state that Proposition 8, “would work a dramatic, substantive change to our Constitution’s ‘underlying principles’ of individual equality, on a scale and scope never previously condoned by this Court.” (Strauss Amended Pet., p. 12.) If permitted to stand, they warn that Proposition 8 “would strike directly at the foundational constitutional principle of equal protection . . . by establishing that an unpopular group may be selectively stripped of fundamental rights by a simple majority of voters.” (Id. at p. 16.) Thus, the Strauss petitioners frame the issue as

“whether the initiative process may be used to enshrine in our Constitution discrimination against a disfavored minority with regard to a fundamental right.” (Id. at p. 18.) Similarly, the CCSF petitioners assert that Proposition 8 is invalid on grounds that “the initiative power does not permit voters to divest a politically unpopular group of rights conferred by the equal protection clause.” (CCSF Second Amended Pet., p. 15, ¶ 34.)

Petitioners’ contention that Proposition 8 is entirely without precedent, either because it takes away constitutional rights generally or equal protection rights specifically, must be assessed in light of this Court’s decisions upholding initiatives challenged as invalid revisions. This Court has upheld as valid amendments measures that deleted or added provisions of the Declaration of Rights or that limited its provisions. (Raven v. Deukmejian, supra, 52 Cal.3d at pp. 342-343, 350 [upholding addition of article I, §§ 14.1, 29, and 30]; In re Lance W., supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 891 [upholding addition of article I, § 28(d)]; Brosnahan v. Brown, supra, 32 Cal.3d at pp. 260-261 [upholding repeal of article I, § 12 and addition of article I, § 28]; People v. Frierson, supra, 25 Cal.3d at pp. 186-187 [upholding addition of article I, § 27, limiting article I, § 6].) This Court has also allowed the initiative process to be used to change specific fundamental rights. As the decisions upholding amendments to the Declaration of Rights demonstrate, such decisions have implicated rights considered as fundamental in our system of justice. (In re Lance W., supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 891 [amendment effecting enforcement of right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure]; Brosnahan v. Brown, 32 Cal.3d at pp. 260-261 [same]; People v. Frierson, supra, 25 Cal.3d at pp. 186-187 [right to be free from cruel or unusual punishment].)

This Court has suggested that the voters might use the initiative process to delete an entire section of the Declaration of Rights. Commenting on the adoption of article I, section 28(d), which limited the use of the exclusionary rule, this Court observed, “The people could by amendment of the Constitution repeal section 13 of Article I in its entirety.” (In re Lance W., supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 891.) Section 13 protects the right of the people to be secure from unreasonable search and seizure. (Cal. Const., art. I, § 13.) Under this reasoning, section 28(d) could not be a revision: “The adoption of section 28(d) which affects only one incident of that guarantee of freedom from unlawful search and seizure, a judicially created remedy for violation of the guarantee, cannot be considered such a sweeping change either in the distribution of powers made in the organic document or in the powers which it vests in the judicial branch as to constitute a revision of the Constitution within the contemplation of Article XVIII.” (In re Lance W., supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 891.)

Petitioners’ argument also must be reconciled with the subsequent history of Hawkins v. Superior Court (1978) 22 Cal.3d 584, which concerned the constitutionality of procedures for prosecution by grand jury indictment. In Hawkins, this Court held that “an accused is denied the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by article I, section 7, of the California Constitution when prosecution is by indictment and he is deprived of a preliminary hearing and the concomitant rights which attach when prosecution is by information.” (Id. at pp. 586-587.) This Court concluded that “the denial of a postindictment preliminary hearing deprives the defendant of ‘such fundamental rights as counsel, confrontation, the right to personally appear, the right to a hearing before a judicial officer, and the right to be free from unwarranted prosecution. These guarantees are expressly or impliedly grounded in both the state and federal Constitutions and must by any test be deemed “fundamental.”’” (Id. at pp. 592-593 (citation omitted).) Yet, new section 14.1 to the Declaration of Rights, added by Proposition 115, abrogated the equal protection holding in Hawkins, and, “as such, a defendant indicted in California is no longer entitled to, and indeed may not be afforded, a postindictment preliminary hearing or any other similar procedure.” (Bowens v. Superior Court (1991) 1 Cal.4th 36, 39.) This Court recognized that “[t]he only reasonable interpretation of Proposition 115 is that article I, section 14.1, was purposefully intended to abrogate the equal protection analysis underlying the substantive holding in Hawkins.” (Id. at p. 44.) Thus, “the voters’ adoption of article I, section 14.1, must be seen as . . . limiting the scope of the state constitutional right to equal protection . . . as it relates to the constitutionally mandated indictment process.” (Id. at p. 45.) And yet Raven characterized this change in the Constitution, denying a right protected by equal protection, as relating only to an “isolated matter[]” that could not be deemed to “substantially change our preexisting governmental framework.” (Raven v. Deukmejian, supra, 52 Cal.3d at p. 350.) Taken together, Raven and Bowens appear to recognize that the voters may deny fundamental rights protected by the equal protection clause.

However, this case raises a further issue not considered in the earlier cases. Specifically, this Court has held that limiting marriage to opposite-sex unions discriminates on sexual orientation and further held that “statutes imposing differential treatment on the basis of sexual orientation should be viewed as constitutionally suspect under the California Constitution’s equal protection clause.” (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at pp. 840, 843.) And this Court has held that the history of invidious discrimination against gay men and lesbians supports strict judicial scrutiny of classifications that discriminate against them. (Ibid.)

In invoking suspect classification doctrine, petitioners appear to contend that the analysis of whether a constitutional change is an amendment or a revision should include matters beyond the face of the initiative. This would be an apparent change in the legal test. Previously, this Court has held that a revision “must necessarily or inevitably appear from the face of the challenged provision.” (Legislature v. Eu, supra, 54 Cal.3d at p. 510.) Legal challenges to initiatives as improper revisions have historically been considered more like single-subject rule challenges, which can be heard pre-election, and unlike substantive constitutional challenges, which are usually disfavored in a pre-election context because of their potential to disrupt elections. (Independent Energy Producers Assn. v. McPherson (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1020, 1029.)

Petitioners’ apparent legal theory might prove problematic if applied outside the specific context of In re Marriage Cases and Proposition 8. If a court is confronted with an initiative addressing a right not yet deemed fundamental or a classification not yet deemed suspect, that court would find it extremely difficult to prevent the electorate from voting on the initiative or to invalidate the initiative post-election.

For example, consider the decision by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Goodridge v. Department of Public Health (Mass. 2003) 798 N.E.2d 941, 961, which held that the Massachusetts' exclusion of same-sex couples failed even rational basis review. Because it reached this conclusion, that court declined to consider whether the marriage exclusion denied a fundamental right or implicated a suspect classification. (Ibid.) If this Court had adopted Goodridge's exact holding in In re Marriage Cases, would a subsequent initiative attempting to bar same-sex marriage be an amendment or a revision? In other words, should the distinction between an amendment and a revision turn on the precise legal reasoning used by the Court in reaching its conclusion? Such a rule raises the possibility that the judiciary might appear to insulate its rulings from the initiative process by deeming certain rights as fundamental or certain classifications as suspect rather than deciding constitutional questions on narrower grounds.

Respondent respectfully submits that, while petitioners present important concerns about the use of the initiative process to limit the rights of minorities, any potential expansion of the test for finding a revision also raises important questions. In answering these questions, this Court must also consider well-settled principles that guide judicial review of the initiatives:

Although the legislative power under our state Constitution is vested in the Legislature, ‘the people reserve to themselves the powers of initiative and referendum.’ [Citation omitted.] Accordingly, the initiative power must be liberally construed to promote the democratic process. [Citation omitted.] Indeed, it is our solemn duty to jealously guard the precious initiative power, and to resolve any reasonable doubts in favor of its exercise. [Citation omitted.] As with statutes adopted by the Legislature, all presumptions favor the validity of initiative measures and mere doubts as to validity are insufficient; such measures must be upheld unless their unconstitutionality clearly, positively, and unmistakably appears. [Citation omitted.]

(Legislature v. Eu, supra, 54 Cal.3d at pp. 501-502.)

b. Whether Proposition 8 Should Be Considered A Revision Because It Prevents The Judiciary From Protecting Constitutional Rights.

With respect to the impact of Proposition 8 on the foundational powers of the judiciary, the petitioners view the measure as effecting a far-reaching change in the nature of the state’s basic governmental plan by preventing California courts from exercising their core, traditional constitutional role of protecting established equality rights of a minority defined by a suspect classification. (Strauss Amended Pet., pp. 12, 35-44; CCSF Second Amended Pet., pp.28-35; see also Tyler Amended Pet., Mem., pp. 7-8.) For example, the Strauss petitioners argue that Proposition 8 “would substantially alter the system of checks and balances that is fundamental to the structure of our constitutional system.” (Strauss Amended Pet., p. 36.) Just as equal protection is an underlying constitutional principle, “the court’s authority to interpret and apply the guarantee of equal protection is a core judicial function that plays a central role in the system of checks and balances mandated by the separation of powers.” (Id. at p. 36.) In petitioners’ view, Proposition 8 “would entirely strip the courts of authority to enforce the guarantee of equal protection . . . where judicial authority is ordinarily at its height” and “would strike directly at the heart of the allocation of legislative and judicial competence in a way that fundamentally alters the separation of powers contemplated by our existing constitutional scheme.” (Ibid.) This would render California courts “powerless to enforce the guarantee of equal protection for a historically stigmatized and disadvantaged minority with regard to the exercise of a fundamental right. (Id. at p. 42.) Therefore, the petitioners conclude that Proposition 8 would significantly alter the system of checks and balances mandated by the state Constitution and is invalid because it was not adopted through the revision process. (Id. at pp. 42-43.)

Petitioners' contentions are based on an expansive view of the impact on the judiciary of Proposition 8. But Proposition 8 does not expressly expand or diminish the powers of the judicial system. After passage of Proposition 8, this Court retains the same authority to interpret and apply the state Constitution, including the equal protection clause, that it possessed before the measure's approval by the voters.

As noted above, this Court has upheld initiatives adopting constitutional amendments aimed at setting aside judicial decisions. (Raven v. Deukmejian, supra, 52 Cal.3d at p. 348; People v. Frierson, 25 Cal.3d at pp. 186-187.) These decisions amount to a recognition that an initiative proposing to reverse a judicial decision by changing the Constitution does not invariably constitute a revision rather than an amendment.

Further, Proposition 8 does not alter the independent force and effect of the California Constitution. Unlike the proposed amendment struck down in Raven, Proposition 8 does not create a forced linkage between the Court's interpretation of the California Constitution and rulings of the United States Supreme Court on analogous portions of the federal Constitution. The state equal protection clause remains an independent source of rights that this court may interpret independently of the federal Constitution.

In addition, California courts retain authority to interpret and apply Proposition 8 itself. For example, this Court is not precluded from ruling on whether Proposition 8 applies retroactively to marriages occurring before the November 4, 2008 election. Nothing precludes state courts from considering whether Proposition 8 is consistent with the federal Constitution just as this Court did in striking down the initiative at issue in Mulkey v. Reitman, supra, 64 Cal.2d 529, 545, affd. sub nom. Reitman v. Mulkey (1967) 387 U.S. 369 [holding that Proposition 14, which had added a provision to the California Constitution giving property owners “absolute discretion” in deciding to whom to sell, lease or rent their property, constituted racial discrimination in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment].)

This Court has upheld initiatives that have made significant changes in California’s governmental structure. Among other things, this Court has upheld initiatives that changed the state property tax system (Amador Valley, supra, 22 Cal.3d 208), altered the makeup and operation of the Legislature (Legislature v. Eu, supra, 54 Cal.3d 492), and made major changes to the criminal justice system (Brosnahan v. Brown, supra, 32 Cal.3d 236). In order to find that Proposition 8 is a revision, this Court would have to find that its effect on the judiciary is closer to the provision struck down in Raven than to the types of changes that this court has previously upheld.

4. The Effect Of Petitioners' Proposed Test For Revision On The Initiative Process And On Existing Constitutional Provisions Enacted By Initiative.

Petitioners' proposals for determining whether an initiative would effect a revision or amendment of the Constitution, based on a measure's effect on fundamental rights or suspect classifications, raise additional issues concerning the scope of the initiative process and the impact on that process if any of the proposed tests were adopted by this Court.

For example, one factor bearing on this question is the underlying purpose served by establishing different procedures for changing the Constitution and for making the revision process more cumbersome than the process for an amendment. The differentiation between "revise" and "amend" "is not merely between two words; more accurately it is between two procedures and between their respective fields of application." (McFadden v. Jordan, supra, 32 Cal.2d at p. 347.) This Court has suggested “that the revision provision is based on the principle that ‘comprehensive changes’ to the Constitution require more formality, discussion and deliberation than is available through the initiative process.” (Legislature v. Eu, supra, 54 Cal.3d at p. 506.) As one commentator has written, “Prevention of logrolling and voter confusion are implicit policies of the nonrevision requirement.” (Note, Preelection Judicial Review: Taking the Initiative in Voter Protection (1983) 71 Cal.L.Rev. 1216, 1224, n. 55.)

These principles suggest that Proposition 8 should be treated as a revision if this Court concludes that it is the type of measure that requires greater deliberation than ordinarily would be offered by the initiative process for a proposed amendment or if the voters could not reasonably be expected to inform themselves of the measure’s ramifications through the electoral process. Petitioners, however, have not suggested that Proposition 8 involved improper logrolling or voter confusion. Nor have they suggested that the consequences of Proposition 8 were not capable of wide discussion and consideration prior to the election.

Moreover, one may legitimately ask how the rule advocated by petitioners would be applied to future proposed initiative measures. At the very least, it could create uncertainty as to when voters may use the initiative process to adopt constitutional amendments affecting competing interests. (Cf. Tinsley v. Superior Court (1983) 150 Cal.App.3d 90, 99 [recognizing that Proposition 1, approved by voters in 1978, which amended state Constitution's equal protection clause, significantly altered California equal protection law as it applied to school desegregation].)

The potential impact on measures that have been adopted by the voters and are now considered part of the settled law of California should also be considered. For example, Proposition 98, approved by the voters in 1988, amended the state Constitution by "setting a minimum level for 'monies to be applied by the state for the support of school districts and community college districts.'" (8 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (10th ed. 2005) Constitutional Law, p. 582, § 1002; Cal. Const., Art. XVI, § 8(b).) Under the California Constitution, education is a "fundamental interest." (Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal.3d 728, 768.) Under petitioners' formulation of revision/amendment analysis, would Proposition 98 itself be unconstitutional as an improper revision or, even if not, would the voters have the right to change or abolish the provision through the initiative process?

Similarly, Proposition 209, adopted in 1996, amended the Declaration of Rights in the state Constitution to prohibit affirmative action by public entities. (Cal. Const., art. I, § 31.) Among other things, this proposition added language providing that “[t]he state shall not discriminate against, or grant preferential treatment to, any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin in the operation of public employment, public education, or public contracting.” (Ibid.) As with Proposition 98, would petitioners’ argument invalidate Proposition 209 as a revision or, alternatively, remove it from further amendment?

Respondent submits that these factors should be considered along with the contentions made by petitioners and the other issues discussed herein in determining whether Proposition 8 should be deemed an invalid revision or a validly enacted amendment.

B. Issue Two: Does Proposition 8 Violate
The Separation Of Powers Doctrine
Under The California Constitution?

1. The Separation Of Powers Doctrine Would Not Appear To Present An Independent Basis
On Which To Declare
Proposition 8 A Revision Of The State Constitution

The California Constitution provides for the separation of governmental powers among the three branches of state government.

(Bixby v. Pierno (1971) 4 Cal.3d 130, 141.) “The powers of state government are legislative, executive, and judicial. Persons charged with the exercise of one power may not exercise either of the others except as permitted by this Constitution.” (Cal. Const., Art. III, § 3.)

The separation of powers doctrine “limits the authority of one of the three branches of government to arrogate to itself the core functions of another branch.” (Carmel Valley Fire Protection Dist. v. State of California (2001) 25 Cal.4th 287, 297 (Carmel Valley).) “The courts have long recognized that the primary purpose of the separation of powers doctrine is to prevent the combination in the hands of a single person or group of the basic or fundamental powers of government.” (Ibid., internal brackets and quotation marks omitted.)

Notwithstanding these principles, however, “it is well understood that the branches share common boundaries . . . and no sharp line between their operations exists.” (People v. Bunn (2002) 27 Cal.4th 1, 14.) “Indeed, the ‘sensitive balance’ underlying the tripartite system of government assumes a certain degree of mutual oversight and influence.” (Ibid.)

In their petitions, the Strauss and CCSF petitioners raise the separation of powers doctrine in support of their contention that Proposition 8 revises the Constitution by altering the fundamental functions and powers of the judiciary. (See Strauss Amend. Pet., pp. 40-43; CCSF Second Amend. Pet., pp. 30-32.) For example, in Strauss, the petitioners discuss separation of powers in the context of their argument that Proposition 8 would revise the Constitution by preventing the courts from exercising their unique constitutional responsibility to protect the equal protection rights of minorities. (Strauss Amend. Pet., pp. 35-43.) And the CCSF petitioners suggest that Proposition 8 alters the separation of powers by “transfer[ring] final authority over the equal protection rights of unpopular groups from the judiciary to a bare political majority.” (CCSF Second Amend. Pet., p. 30.)

Addressing this assertion in more depth than is done in the CCSF Petition, the Strauss petitioners argue that Proposition 8 would strip the courts of the authority to enforce the guarantee of equal protection and thereby “strike directly at the heart of the allocation of legislative and judicial competence in a way that fundamentally alters the separation of powers contemplated by our existing constitutional scheme.” (Strauss Amend. Pet., p. 41.) They add, “By restricting the courts’ traditional authority to invalidate such overtly discriminatory measures, Proposition 8 would significantly alter the system of checks and balances mandated by our Constitution.” (Id. at pp. 42-43.)

The Strauss and CCSF separation of powers arguments might be better assessed under the rubric of revision-versus-amendment analysis. To the extent that these petitioners are raising concerns about diminishment of judicial power as a revision of the Constitution, those concerns are addressed above.

On the other hand, the Tyler petitioners raise separation of powers as an independent basis on which to find that Proposition 8 could not be validly enacted by the electorate. (Tyler Pet., pp. 9-11.) The Tyler petitioners assert that “[u]nder the separation of powers doctrine, ‘the Legislature may not undertake to readjudicate controversies that have been litigated in the courts and resolved by a final judgment.’” (Tyler Pet., p. 10, quoting Superior Court v. County of Mendocino (1996) 13 Cal.4th 45, 53 (Mendocino)). Relying on this settled rule, the Tyler petitioners contend that “the separation of powers doctrine is violated [if] an initiative effectively readjudicates controversies that were litigated and settled by the courts.” (Ibid.)

To the extent the Tyler petitioners suggest that the initiative process may never be used to abrogate legal holdings announced by this Court, their argument seems contrary to existing authority. (See e.g. People v. Frierson, supra, 25 Cal.3d at p. 186-187 [upholding initiative abrogating People v. Anderson, supra, 6 Cal.3d 628]; Bowens v. Superior Court, supra, 1 Cal.4th at p. 39 [recognizing that Proposition 115 abrogated equal protection holding in Hawkins v. Superior Court, supra, 22 Cal.3d 584].).) As this Court has said, “[s]eparation of powers principles do not preclude the Legislature from amending a statute and applying the change to both pending and future cases.” (People v. Bunn, supra, 27 Cal.4th at p. 17.)

Indeed, “with regard to functions over which one branch of government possesses primary and inherent power, the other branches do not necessarily violate the separation of powers doctrine simply because they undertake actions that affect those core functions.” (In re Rosenkrantz (2002) 29 Cal.4th 616, 662.) “[T]he separation of powers doctrine is violated only when the actions of a branch of government defeat or materially impair the inherent functions of another branch.” (Ibid.)

This Court has previously applied these principles to legislative encroachments on judicial functions. “In the context of asserted legislative encroachment on the judicial power . . ., although we have invalidated legislative measures that would defeat or materially impair this court's inherent power . . ., we have rejected separation of powers claims

when no material impairment appeared.” (Carmel Valley, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 298.)

For example, in Carmel Valley, the Supreme Court cited Hustedt v. Workers' Comp. Appeals Bd. (1981) 30 Cal.3d 329, as a case in which the Legislature had defeated or materially impaired the Court's inherent power. Hustedt held that the Legislature violated the separation of powers doctrine by bestowing the power to discipline attorneys on the Workers' Compensation Appeals Board. (Id. at pp. 339-341.) “In purporting to bestow the power to discipline attorneys upon the Board, the Legislature overreached its traditionally recognized authority, under the police power, to regulate the practice of law.” (Id. at p. 341.)

On the other hand, Carmel Valley cited Mendocino as a case in which a legislative act did not materially infringe upon the separate powers of the judiciary. In Mendocino, this Court construed the facial constitutionality of Government Code section 68108, which authorized counties to declare unpaid furlough days that would require closure of the courts along with other county offices. (Mendocino, supra, 13 Cal.4th at pp. 60-61.) No separation of powers violation was present: “[I]t cannot reasonably be suggested that, under any and all circumstances, a county's designation of one or more unpaid furlough days pursuant to section 68108 necessarily will ‘defeat’ or ‘materially impair’ a court’s fulfillment of its constitutional duties.” (Id. at p. 60.) Nor did the Legislature’s action “inevitably threaten the integrity or independence of the judicial process” or intrude upon “the judge’s decisionmaking process or the independence of the judicial role.” (Id. at p. 65.)

Here, on its face, Proposition 8 does not purport to “defeat or materially impair” the Court’s ability to fulfill its constitutional duties. Nor, unlike the provision struck down in Raven, does it change constitutional provisions in a way that threatens the ability of the judiciary to interpret the California Constitution as an independent document. On the other hand, to the extent the Tyler petitioners, like the Strauss and CCSF petitioners, direct their contentions to the showing that would establish a constitutional revision, this issue has been addressed above.

Of course, “there are some functions performed by the judicial branch that the separation of power doctrine prohibits the Legislature from exercising under any circumstances.” (Mendocino, supra, 13 Cal.4th at p. 61.) “[W]hile the Legislature enjoys very broad governmental power under our constitutional framework, it does not possess the authority to review or to readjudicate final court judgments on a case by case basis.” (Mandel v. Myers (1981) 29 Cal.3d 531, 549.) For example, in Mandel, the Court held that while the Legislature could enact “generally applicable statutory measures” to limit state expenditures, it could not reject a particular attorney fee award because of its disagreement with the merits of a final court judgment rendered in the case. (Id. at p. 551.)

Arguably, an initiative measure that purported to set aside a court judgment in the manner disallowed by Mandel might be deemed a constitutional revision. But the Tyler petitioners misplace their reliance on this rule. (See Tyler Pet., p. 9.) Regardless of other concerns that may be expressed regarding Proposition 8, it cannot be reasonably construed -- and should not be construed -- as seeking to readjudicate specific court judgments. (Cf. Schulman v. Attorney General (Mass. 2006) 850 N.E.2d 505, 506-507 [holding that a proposed initiative that would have banned same-sex marriage in response to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court’s decision in Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, supra, 798 N.E.2d 941, was not invalid under provision of Massachusetts Constitution prohibiting initiatives that reverse a judicial decision].)

This approach is consistent with this Court’s holding in Professional Engineers, supra, which, in addition to finding that the constitutional amendment implemented by Proposition 35 was not a revision, held that it did not violate the separation of powers by diverting a legislative function to the executive branch. (Professional Engineers, supra, 40 Cal.4th at pp. 1044-1045.) “[T]he setting of policy with respect to private contracting is a legislative matter and, therefore, a proper subject for the electorate to exercise its legislative authority through initiative, which is what the electorate has done.” (Id. at p. 1045.) Similarly, it is not impermissible for the voters, when done through a valid amendment, to exercise their authority through the initiative process to alter legal pronouncements issued by the courts.

C. Issue Three: If Proposition 8 Is Not Unconstitutional, What Is The Effect, If Any, On The Marriages Of Same-sex Couples Performed Before The Adoption Of Proposition 8?

1. Legislation Is Presumed To Operate Prospectively Absent Express Language Or A Clear And Unequivocal Implication That It Applies Retroactively.

“It is an established canon of interpretation that statutes are not to be given a retrospective operation unless it is clearly made to appear that such was the legislative intent.” (Aetna Casualty & Surety Co. v. Industrial Accident Com. (1947) 30 Cal.2d 388, 393.) This principle “reflects the common understanding that legislative provisions are presumed to operate prospectively, and that they should be so interpreted ‘unless express language or clear and unavoidable implication negatives the presumption.’” (Evangelatos v. Superior Court (1988) 44 Cal.3d 1188, 1208, quoting Glavinich v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. (1984) 163 Cal.App.3d 263, 272.) “‘Retroactivity is not favored in the law. Thus, [legislative] enactments and administrative rules will not be construed to have retroactive effect unless their language requires this result.’” (Aktar v. Anderson (1997) 58 Cal.App.4th 1166, 1179, quoting Bowen v. Georgetown University Hospital (1988) 488 U.S. 204, 208.)

“[T]he presumption against retroactive legislation is deeply rooted in our jurisprudence, and embodies a legal doctrine centuries older than our Republic. Elementary considerations of fairness dictate that individuals should have an opportunity to know what the law is and to conform their conduct accordingly; settled expectations should not be lightly disrupted.” (Landgraf v. USI Film Products (1994) 511 U.S. 244, 265, footnotes omitted.) This Court has emphasized this presumption in other citations to the United States Supreme Court:

Justice (now Chief Justice) Rehnquist succinctly captured the well-established legal precepts governing the interpretation of a statute to determine whether it applies retroactively or prospectively, explaining: “The principle that statutes operate only prospectively, while judicial decisions operate retrospectively, is familiar to every law student. . . . This court has often pointed out: “[T]he first rule of construction is that legislation must be considered as addressed to the future, not to the past. . . . The rule has been expressed in varying degrees of strength but always of one import, that a retrospective operation will not be given to a statute which interferes with antecedent rights . . . unless such be “the unequivocal and inflexible import of the terms, and the manifest intention of the legislature.””

(Evangelatos v. Superior Court, supra, at p. 1206-1207, quoting United States v. Security Industrial Bank (1982) 459 U.S. 70, 79-80, italics omitted.)

Thus, “California continues to adhere to the time-honored principle . . . that in the absence of an express retroactivity provision, a statute will not be applied retroactively unless it is very clear from extrinsic sources that the Legislature or the voters must have intended a retroactive application.” (Evangelatos v. Superior Court, supra, 44 Cal.3d at 1209; accord, Myers v. Philip Morris Companies, Inc. (2002) 28 Cal.4th 828, 844 [“[A] statute may be applied retroactively only if it contains express language of retroactivity or if other sources provide a clear and unavoidable implication that the Legislature intended retroactive application.”]). This principle applies equally to initiative measures approved by the voters. (Id. at p.1209 [applying presumption against retroactivity to Proposition 51]; Rosasco v. Commission on Judicial Performance (2000) 82 Cal.App.4th 315, 323 [following Evangelatos and holding Proposition 190, which amended state Constitution, not retroactive].) “Initiative measures are subject to the same rules and canons of statutory construction as ordinary legislative enactments.” (Rosasco v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 82 Cal.App.4th at p. 323.)

For example, in Evangelatos, this Court held that Proposition 51 (the Fair Responsibility Act of 1986) was limited to prospective application because, in part, “we find nothing in the language of Proposition 51 which expressly indicates that the statute is to apply retroactively.” (Id. at p. 1209.) “[A] fair reading of the proposition as a whole makes it clear that the subject of retroactivity or prospectivity was simply not addressed.” (Ibid.) Further, Evangelatos found that a retroactive application could not be inferred from the ballot materials. (Id. at pp. 1209-1221.) “Defendants can point to nothing in the election brochure materials which provide any comparable confirmation of an actual intention on the part of the drafters or electorate to apply the statute retroactively.” (Id. at p. 1211.)

Ballot Materials Demonstrate That Proposition 8 Operates Prospectively
And May Not Be Applied
Retroactively.

Applying these fundamental principles of statutory construction leads inevitably to the conclusion that Proposition 8, even if found constitutional, has only prospective application and may not be applied retroactively. Nothing in the measure's plain language "expressly" provides for retroactive application. Nor do the measure or the ballot materials "clearly and unavoidably" imply that retroactivity was intended by the drafters or the electorate.

At the outset, it must be recognized that Proposition 8 may not be construed as declaring existing law prior to the November 2008 election to be contrary to this Court's decision in Marriage Cases. "When this court 'finally and definitively' interprets a statute, the Legislature does not have the power to then state that a later amendment merely declared existing law." (Carter v. California Dept. of Veterans Affairs (2006) 38 Cal.4th 914, 922; see McClung v. Employment Development Dept. (2004) 34 Cal.4th 467, 470 ["After the judiciary definitively and finally interprets a statute, . . . the Legislature may amend the statute to say something different. But if it does so, it changes the law; it does not merely state what the law always was.”].) Thus, notwithstanding Proposition 8, Marriage Cases remains the declaration of the constitutionality of state law before the election. Instead, the issue is whether Proposition 8 may be retroactively applied to existing marriages that were lawfully recognized and solemnized before the measure’s approval by the electorate.

Proposition 8's text, which states that “[o]nly marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California,” plainly does not include an express retroactivity clause. Nor may retroactivity be inferred from such language. (See Myers v. Philip Morris Companies, Inc., supra, 28 Cal.4th at p. 843 [ambiguity required statute to be read as unambiguously prospective].) As this Court has said, “the time-honored presumption against retroactive application of a statute . . . would be meaningless if [such] vague phrases . . . were considered sufficient to satisfy the test of a ‘clear manifestation’ . . . or an ‘unequivocal and inflexible’ assertion of the . . . [s]tatute’s retroactivity.” (Ibid, citations and original brackets omitted; accord, Californians for Disability Rights v. Mervyn's LLC (2006) 39 Cal.4th 223, 229-230 [“[I]n modern times, we have been cautious not to infer the voters’ or the Legislature’s intent on the subject of prospective versus retrospective operation from ‘vague phrases’ . . . and ‘broad, general language’ . . . in statutes, initiative measures and ballot pamphlets.”].)

Further, nothing in the extrinsic ballot materials supports such an inference under the exacting standards that have been applied by this Court. For example, in the voter guide distributed to registered voters, the Official Title and Summary advised voters that the measure would change the California Constitution to eliminate the right of same-sex couples to marry in California and summarized the specific terms of the measure. (Ballot Pamp., Gen. Elec. (Nov. 4, 2008), Official Title and Summary for Proposition 8, RJN Exh. 14, p. 54.) But the title and summary did not suggest that the measure would impact existing marriages. (Ibid.) Further, the Analysis by the Legislative Analyst noted that, as a result of this Court’s decision overruling Proposition 22, “marriage between individuals of the same sex is currently valid or recognized in the state.” (Id. at p. 55.) But, as with the title and summary, the Legislative Analyst did not inform voters that the import of the measure would be to retroactively void thousands of existing and legal marriages. (Ibid.)

Moreover, the ballot arguments for and against the measure never claimed that Proposition 8 would have such a far-reaching retroactive effect. In the official voter guide distributed to registered voters, the proponents argued that a vote of “YES on Proposition 8 does three simple things: It restores the definition of marriage to what the vast majority of California voters already approved and human history understood marriage to be. It overturns the outrageous decision of four activist Supreme Court judges who ignored the will of the people. It protects our children from being taught in public schools that ‘same-sex marriage’ is the same as traditional marriage.” (Id. at p. 56.) Their argument in rebuttal states “Your YES vote on Proposition 8 means that only marriage between a man and a woman will be valid or recognized in California, regardless of when or where performed.” (Id. at p. 57.) Nor did the opponents of Proposition 8 address the possible retroactive effect of the initiative in either the argument against Proposition 8 or the rebuttal to argument in favor of Proposition 8. (Id. at pp. 56-57.) Nothing in these materials would have alerted an informed voter that Proposition 8 could be construed as retroactive.

It is worth noting that the proponents of the measure began their argument with the assertion that Proposition 8 is “simple and straightforward.” (Id. at p. 56.) Surely, if Proposition 8 were so “simple and straightforward” as to encompass existing marriages as well as future marriages that impact would be clear from the measure itself or from the extrinsic materials. The proponents' own characterization of the measure belies an intent to make it retroactive.

Thus, while the arguments in favor of Proposition 8 state the measure is intended to "do three simple things," none would unambiguously suggest retroactive effect on existing same-sex marriages. The rebuttal to the opponents of Proposition 8 vaguely states that California law will recognize a marriage only between a man and a woman "regardless of when or where performed." But this isolated and ambiguous statement contained in a rebuttal to an argument is insufficient to cast aside the bedrock principle of non-retroactivity. As this Court has noted, "if the retroactive application had been brought to the attention of the electorate, it might well have detracted from the popularity of the measure." (Evangelatos v. Superior Court, supra, 44 Cal.3d at p. 1219.) The subject of retroactivity was not put to the voters, and this Court should not lightly infer that voters contemplated that this would be the outcome from voting in favor of the measure.

When a court seeks to divine the legislative purpose, "[a] wide variety of factors may illuminate the legislative design, 'such as context, the object in view, the evils to be remedied, the history of the times and of legislation upon the same subject, public policy, and contemporaneous construction.”” (In re Marriage of Bouquet (1976) 16 Cal.3d 583, 587, quoting Alford v. Pierno (1972) 27 Cal.App.3d 682, 688.) As shown by the plain language of the measure and the ballot materials provided to voters, such factors as context, purpose and construction militate against retroactive application.

Nor does consideration of “the history of the times and of legislation upon the same subject” support an inference of retroactivity. (See Evangelatos v. Superior Court, supra, 44 Cal.3d at p. 1211 [assessing these factors in construing intent of initiative proponents].) Far from supporting retroactivity, these factors strongly indicate that a knowledgeable voter reading Proposition 8 and the ballot materials would have concluded that the measure, if enacted, would apply prospectively to persons contemplating marriage but not retroactively to existing marriages. At the time the proposed initiative measure was being drafted, the proponents, interveners in this action, were well aware that the issue of same-sex marriage was pending in this Court. It required little imagination to recognize that same-sex marriages would occur legally before the November 2008 election if this Court, as it in fact did, found that statutes prohibiting such marriages were unconstitutional. If the proponents had intended not only to ban same-sex marriages prospectively but to also void existing same-sex marriages, they could have easily phrased the measure to expressly address this contingency. (See ibid. [“[I]t appears rather clear that the drafters of Proposition 51, in omitting any provision with regard to retroactivity, must have recognized that the statute would not be applied retroactively.”]) The proponents failure to do so underscores that the presumption against retroactivity is not overcome by Proposition 8.

3. Added Factors Establish That Proposition 8 Should Be Declared To Have No Retroactive Effect On Marriages Entered Into Before The November Election.

In addition to the presumption against retroactivity, several additional factors demonstrate that Proposition 8 should be limited to so that it operates only prospectively and has no retroactive effect on marriages lawfully entered into prior to the November 2008 election.

For example, “[a]n established rule of statutory construction requires [a court] to construe statutes to avoid ‘constitutional infirmities.’” (Myers v. Phillip Morris Companies, Inc., supra, 28 Cal.4th at p. 846.)

Plainly, even if Proposition 8 is upheld as a valid constitutional amendment, its retroactive application to existing marriages would, at the very least, raise significant issues under the United States Constitution. In the absence of clear direction from the voters that the measure was intended to be retroactive, it should be interpreted to avoid these questions. This can be accomplished by limiting its scope to future marriage applicants.

Moreover, “[r]etrospective legislation . . . may not be applied where such application impairs a vested property right without due process of law.” (In re Marriage of Fabian (1986) 40 Cal.3d 440, 447.) Of course, “[v]ested rights are not immutable; the state, exercising its police power, may impair such rights when considered reasonably necessary to protect the health, safety, morals and general welfare of the people.” (In re Marriage of Buol (1985) 39 Cal.3d 751, 760-761.) In determining whether a retroactive law contravenes the due process clause, a court considers “such factors as the significance of the state interest served by the law, the importance of the retroactive application of the law to the effectuation of that interest, the extent of reliance upon the former law, the legitimacy of that reliance, the extent of actions taken on the basis of that reliance, and the extent to which the retroactive application of the new law would disrupt those actions.” (In re Marriage of Bouquet (1976) 16 Cal.3d 583, 592.) It has been suggested that “it is upon the sole question of whether or not there has been reliance upon, or the reasonable expectation of the continuance of, preexisting law that constitutionality of retroactive legislation depends.”

Here, retroactive application of Proposition 8 to existing same-sex marriages would overturn the settled expectations of couples who entered into these marriages in reliance on the holding in Marriage Cases. Given the strong presumption against retroactive statutory application, the vested interest that these couples have in the continued existence of their marriages should not be overturned in the absence of clear direction from the voters. This is particularly true given that many life-altering decisions have undoubtedly been made by newly married persons in the wake of Marriage Cases. These decisions may involve such matters as estate-planning, child-rearing, and property ownership. Nowhere in the ballot materials do the proponents advance a reason why the public interest would be served by interfering with such interests by voiding the marriages.

As this Court has recognized, “[i]n the interest of finality, uniformity and predictability, retroactivity of marital property statutes should be reserved for those rare instances when such disruption is necessary to promote a significantly important state interest.” (In re Fabian, supra, 40 Cal.3d at p. 450.) Without question, existing marriages are no less deserving of protection from being declared void by retroactive application of a newly enacted amendment.

Moreover, it has long been recognized that objection to retroactivity may be made “where . . . the obligation of a contract . . . is impaired.” (McCann v. Jordan (1933) 218 Cal. 577, 579 [upholding retroactivity of statute where “we have no contract and no vested right.”]; see (7 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (10th ed. 2005) Constitutional Law, § 623, pp. 1017-1018 [“A retrospective law is invalid . . . if it conflicts with certain constitutional protections, e.g., if it . . . impairs the obligation of a contract.”].) California law recognizes that “[m]arriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract . . . to which the consent of the parties capable of making that contract is necessary.” (Fam. Code, § 300 [excluding language “between a man and a woman” stricken as unconstitutional in In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at p. 857].)

These factors help distinguish this case from the situation faced by this Court in Lockyer. There, this Court ruled that the approximately 4,000 same-sex marriages sanctioned by the City and County of San Francisco “must be considered void and of no legal effect from their inception” because they did not comply with state law when they were entered into. (Lockyer v. City and County of San Francisco (2004) 33 Cal.4th 1055, 1113.) Unlike Lockyer, the crucial distinction here is that persons have entered into marriages that were legal at the time of formation.

It has been widely reported that thousands of same-sex couples have been married between June 16, when such marriages could be lawfully recognized in California for the first time, and the passage of Proposition 8 on November 4. The licenses issued for these couples did not contravene any law of the state of California and, as a result of Marriage Cases, these marriages were not unlawful on that basis. Those same-sex couples who relied on California law to enter into legally recognized marriages, like any married couple, as well as their other family members and their community, have settled expectations regarding these marriages that deserve protection. The Court should declare that these marriages remain valid and recognized in California notwithstanding the passage of Proposition 8.

D. Proposition 8 Should Be Invalidated Even If It Is Deemed To Amend The Constitution Because It Abrogates Fundamental Rights Protected By Article I Without A Compelling Interest.

Respondent Attorney General is the chief law officer of the state. (Cal. Const., art. V, § 13.) In that capacity, he is duty bound to uphold the whole of the Constitution, not only the People’s reservation of the initiative power, but also the People’s expression of their will in the Constitution’s Declaration of Rights. (Cal. Const., art. I, § 1.) In reconciling these separate constitutional protections, Respondent concludes that the initiative power could never have been intended to give the voters an unfettered prerogative to amend the Constitution for the purpose of depriving a disfavored group of rights determined by the Supreme Court to be part of fundamental human liberty.

This case concerns the right of same-sex couples to marry, which this Court has determined to be part of fundamental liberty. But the issues raised here go far beyond the issue of same-sex marriage.

Petitioners’ arguments could as well be raised by a proposed amendment resurrecting a ban on interracial marriage;^{11/} a proposed amendment prohibiting a class of persons from adopting children;^{12/} a measure denying

11. In this regard, the Court noted that, “In Perez v. Sharp . . . the court did not characterize the constitutional right that the plaintiffs in that case sought to obtain as ‘a right to interracial marriage’ and did not dismiss the plaintiffs’ constitutional challenge on the ground that such marriages never had been permitted in California.” (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at p. 811; cf., Naim v. Naim (Va. 1955) 87 S.E.2d 749, 753 [refusing to follow Perez because the ruling “is contrary to the otherwise uninterrupted course of judicial decision, both State and Federal, as pointed out in the dissenting opinion, with which we agree”].)

12. See, e.g., In re Adoption of Doe (Fla. Circ. Ct. Nov. 25, 2008) 2008 WL 5006172 [invalidating initiative statute barring homosexuals from adopting children]

employment to a class of persons;^{13/} a measure prohibiting unwed couples generally from serving as foster parents;^{14/} a measure quarantining persons with a disease, or forbidding them from holding employment;^{15/} or a measure forbidding landowners to lease or rent to a class of persons, and denying that class of persons the right to enter into contracts.^{16/}

At bottom, the question is whether rights secured under the state Constitution's safeguard of liberty as an "inalienable" right may intentionally be withdrawn from a class of persons by an initiative amendment.^{17/} Although petitioners have couched their complaint in terms

15. See 1986 California General Election, Proposition 64 [AIDS], RJN Exh. 12; 1988 Primary Election, Proposition 69 [same], RJN Exh. 13.

16. See Lozano v. City of Hazleton (M.D. Pa. 2007) 496 F.Supp.2d 477, 555 ["Hazleton, in its zeal to control the presence of a group deemed undesirable [undocumented residents], violated the rights of such people, as well as others within the community"].

17. Rights protected by sections other than section 1 in article I may or may not be encompassed by those expressly identified as "inalienable" by the Framers in section 1. Similarly, after the 1849 and 1879 Conventions, the right to safe schools has been expressly identified as "inalienable." (Const., art. I, § 28, subd. (c).) Although "privacy" was expressly added to Article I, section 1, in 1972, nevertheless at least insofar as the right includes the principle of personal autonomy, the right to privacy was reasonably encompassed by the right to liberty. (See Hill v. National Collegiate Athletic Assn. (1994) 7 Cal.4th 1, 28-29.) Respondent's suggestion here is intended to encompass only initiative amendments that diminish or abrogate the right to liberty, which has been expressly guaranteed by the Framers in the 1849 and 1879 Conventions in article of the amendment-revision dichotomy, this litigation, perhaps for the first time, poses a more fundamental question: Is the initiative-amendment power wholly unfettered by the California Constitution's protection of the People's fundamental right to life, liberty, and privacy?

This Court must consider this question, not only because it is part of instant dispute, but also because its resolution will serve as precedent to guide the analysis of future proposed amendments that purport to impair fundamental rights. Accordingly, respondent proposes a means of preserving a clear distinction between amendment and revision, while at the same time giving appropriate weight to rights that the Supreme Court has deemed to be a fundamental.

1. Article I, Section 1, Enjoys A Privileged Status In The Plan Of The Constitutional Conventions As The Essential Safeguard Of Individual Freedom.

Both the 1849 and 1879 Constitutional Conventions declared liberty to be one of the "inalienable" rights that are secured by section 1 of the Declaration of Rights in article I of the California Constitution. Others included "acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining safety, and happiness." (Cal. Const., art. I, § 1.) The Framers' purpose in declaring certain rights to be “inalienable” was to place those fundamental rights of citizens beyond the power of the Legislature or the Executive to abrogate. As both this Court and the United States Supreme Court have recognized in the context of the Bill of Rights, the federal analogue to California’s Declaration of Rights:

The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.

(West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette (1943) 319 U.S. 624, 638, quoted in In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at p. 852.)^{18/}

The rights recognized as “inalienable” by the Framers in 1849 and 1879 were so designated because it was generally believed as a matter

18. In this regard, one delegate to the 1849 Convention expressed his understanding of the compact:

What says your bill of rights? It says in the first place that the people are sovereigns. It then goes on to specify certain inalienable rights, and to provide that those rights shall not be infringed upon. The people agree, by adopting the Constitution, that so long as they are members of the community, they will not infringe on those special rights; but they reserve control over all others not restricted by the Constitution.

political philosophy that a constitution is not the source of these rights.

The rights “antedate” the constitution as inherent in human nature, and the constitution is the covenant by which Society secures those inherent freedoms to itself. These rights were not surrendered in the “social compact.” (See Ex parte Newman (1858) 9 Cal. 502, 507 (opn. of Terry, J.) [“When societies are formed, each individual surrenders certain rights, and as an equivalent for that surrender has secured to him the enjoyment of certain others appertaining to his person and property, without the protection of which society cannot exist.”]; see also id. at p. 511 (opn. of Burnett, J.) [“[T]here must be certain inherent and inalienable rights of human nature that no government can rightfully take away. These rights are retained by the individual because their surrender is not required by the good of the whole. The just and legitimate ends of civil government can be practically and efficiently accomplished whilst these rights are retained by the individual. Every person, upon entering into a state of society, only surrenders so much of his individual rights as may be necessary to secure the substantial happiness of the community. Whatever is not necessary to attain this end is reserved to himself.”]; Ex parte Quarg (1906) 149 Cal. 79, 80 [“Under our form of government by Constitutions the individual, in becoming a member of organized society, unless the Constitution states otherwise, surrenders only so much of these personal rights as may be considered essential to the just and reasonable exercise of the police power in furtherance of the objects for which it exists. [Citations]”];^{19/} cf.

Meachum v. Fano (1976) 427 U.S. 215, 230 (dis. opn. of Stevens, J.)

[“[N]either the Bill of Rights nor the laws of sovereign States create the liberty which the Due Process Clause protects. The relevant constitutional provisions are limitations on the power of the sovereign to infringe on the liberty of the citizen Of course, law is essential to the exercise and enjoyment of individual liberty in a complex society. But it is not the source of liberty, and surely not the exclusive source”]; Richmond F. & P. R. Co. v. City of Richmond (Va. 1926) 133 S.E. 800, 803 [inherent rights of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness “existed before society was organized and are not surrendered by entering into the organization”].)

The protection of these rights, then, was one of the very purposes of the Constitution. (See Cal. Const., Preamble [“We the People of the State of California, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure and perpetuate its blessings, do establish this Constitution.” (emphasis added)]; see, e.g., Budd v. People (1892) 143 U.S.

19. Professor Grodin describes this principle as the corollary to the basic Lockean premise as to the justification for government that is presently articulated in Article II, Section 1 of the Constitution. (See Grodin, The California State Constitution, supra, p. 65.)

517, 550 [“Men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, -‘life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;’ and to ‘secure,’ not grant or create, these rights, governments are instituted.”].)

Whereas these inalienable rights were not expressly declared in the original United States Constitution (they were, of course, set out in the Declaration of Independence), the Framers of the California Constitution purposefully made them part of the state charter because they understood that no similar safeguard against state government was available under the Bill of Rights. More than a decade before the 1849 Constitution, Chief Justice Marshall had made clear that citizens must look to their own constitutions for limitations on state governmental invasion of property rights. (Barron v. Baltimore, supra, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243; see Grodin, The California Supreme Court and State Constitutional Rights: The Early Years (2004) 31 Hastings Const. L.Q. 141, 141-143; see also, Van Cleave, supra, 21 Hastings Const. L. Q. at pp. 103-104.)

While Respondent does not suggest that the Framers contemplated that liberty interests included a right to marry that extended to same-sex couples, the scope of liberty interests evolves over time as determined by the Supreme Court. As Justice Thurgood Marshall observed, “[H]istory makes clear that constitutional principles of equality, like constitutional principles of liberty, property, and due process, evolve over time; what once was a “natural” and “self-evident” ordering later comes to be seen as an artificial and invidious constraint on human potential and freedom.”” (City of Cleburne, Tex. v. Cleburne Living Center (1985) 473 U.S. 432, 467 (conc. & dis. opn. of Marshall, J.) (citations omitted); see also Perez v. Sharp (1948) 32 Cal.2d 711, 714 [““The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects an area of personal liberty not yet wholly delimited.””].) Certainly in 1849 or 1879, the Framers would not have considered contraception to be an aspect of fundamental liberty. But the United States Supreme Court came to that conclusion in 1965. (Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) 381 U.S. 749.)

The United States Supreme Court recognized that the right to marry is an aspect of fundamental liberty (See Meyer v. Nebraska (1923) 262 U.S. 390, 349.) But as is evident from the dissent in Perez, supra, and from the rejection of the Court’s decision in that case by other state courts, there was no universal agreement that the fundamental right to marry extended to interracial marriages. (See Perez v. Sharp, supra, 32 Cal.2d at p. 742 et seq. (dis. opn. of Shenk, J.) As this Court had done in Perez, the Court in In re Marriage Cases held that the civil right to marry is not a right limited by Nineteenth Century notions about the nature of that institution, and the Court extended the right -- as a liberty interest -- to include same-sex couples. (See In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at pp. 781-782.) This holding now delineates the scope of the right to marry protected by article I of the California Constitution.

2. The Framers Did Not Give The Legislature The Power To Put A
Group's Right To Enjoy Liberty To A Popular Vote.

The Framers (and the People in adopting the Constitution) intended article I, section 1 to act as a check on legislative excesses. (See Van Cleave, supra, 21 Hastings Const. L. Q. at pp. 99-101.) Given that protective purpose, the Framers (and the People) would not have endowed ^{20/} the Legislature with the power to eliminate a judicially recognized fundamental liberty interest through a constitutional amendment passed by popular vote -- at least not without a compelling reason for doing so.^{21/}

20. For example, the right of a citizen to work at a lawful occupation (Bautista v. Jones (1944) 25 Cal.2d 746, 749) or the right to contract (Ex parte Drexel (1905) 147 Cal. 763), or the right to dispose of one's property in a lawful manner (Ex parte Quarg, supra, 149 Cal. at p. 80).

21. The Legislature did not obtain the power to propose revisions to the Constitution until 1962. Not presented by this case is the question whether the Legislature could propose a revision to the Constitution without regard to the limitations of article I, section 1. As noted, in 1962, by amendment to the Constitution, the Legislature acquired a share in what was previously the constitutional convention's exclusive power to propose constitutional revisions. (See now, Cal. Const., art. XVIII, §§ 1, 2.)

And if the Framers did not contemplate such broad legislative powers, then they never would have intended to subject the rights of individuals or groups under article I to abrogation by popular vote—raising the specter of Mills’s “tyranny of the majority.” (John Stuart Mill, On Liberty (1869) 6.)^{22/} This Court stated in 1874: “Our government is a representative republic, not a simple democracy. Whenever it shall be transformed into the latter—as we are taught by the examples of history—the tyranny of a changeable majority will soon drive honest men to seek refuge beneath the despotism of a single ruler.” (Ex parte Wall (1874) 48 Cal. 279, 314, overruled on other grounds in Ex parte Beck (1912) 162 Cal. 701, 705 [re delegation of legislative power].) And, in the same year, the United States Supreme Court made this observation:

It must be conceded that there are such rights in every free government beyond the control of the State. A government which recognized no such rights, which held the lives, the liberty, and the property of its citizens subject at all times to the absolute disposition and unlimited control of even the most democratic depository of power, is after all but a despotism. It is true it is a despotism of the many, of the majority, if you choose to call it so, but it is none the less a despotism. It may well be doubted if a man is to hold

22. Not only would such a proposition arguably have been inconsistent with the idea of “inalienable” rights altogether, but it would seemingly have been inconsistent with the belief that California’s citizens should not have to look to federal judges and the United States Constitution for protection of their fundamental rights – and, of course, in 1849 such protection did not exist.

all that he is accustomed to call his own, all in which he has placed his happiness, and the security of which is essential to that happiness, under the unlimited dominion of others, whether it is not wiser that this power should be exercised by one man than by many.

(Citizens' Savings & Loan Assn. v. City of Topeka (1874) 87 U.S. 655, 662.)

If the Legislature's power to propose amendments did not include the unlimited power—i.e. without sufficient justification in furtherance of the public health, safety, or welfare—to propose an amendment for the purpose of putting fundamental rights to a popular vote, then the power of initiative-amendment, reserved to the People in 1911 (see Cal. Const., art. IV, § 1), could likewise not have encompassed any such power. The point of the initiative power was to enable the People to circumvent the Legislature (see Amador Valley, supra, 22 Cal.3d at pp. 228-229), not to invest the voters with a power that the Legislature itself did not possess.

One could maintain that the initiative-amendment power does not extend to proposals abrogating fundamental rights. Alternatively, one could maintain that article I does not apply to initiative-amendment measures, suggesting that the 1911 amendment of article IV, section 1 (and as partially reformulated as present article XVIII, section 3) impliedly repealed article I, section 1. The Court need not adopt either of these alternatives: if the Court concludes that a material conflict exists between the guarantees of article I, section 1, and article XVIII, section 3, the Court should harmonize the two constitutional provisions. (See City and County of San Francisco v. County of San Mateo (1995) 10 Cal.4th 554, 563 [“In choosing between alternative interpretations of constitutional provisions we are further constrained by our duty to harmonize various constitutional provisions . . . in order to avoid the implied repeal of one provision by another. Implied repeals are disfavored.”].)^{23/}

3. The Court Can Harmonize The Constitutional Guarantees Under Article I With The Initiative-Amendment Power By Evaluating Whether A Proposed Amendment Abrogating Fundamental Rights Serves A Compelling Interest; Proposition 8 Does Not Satisfy This Test.

Even “inalienable” rights were understood by many from the early days of statehood to be subject to restriction or abrogation when the public good requires (See, e.g., Ingram v. Colgan (1894) 106 Cal. 113,

23. Such harmonization would also give effect to the Framers’ intent, discussed above, that the Declaration of Rights serve as a source of citizen protection that is independent of the Bill of Rights. (See also, Cal. Const., art. I, § 24 [“Rights guaranteed by this Constitution are not dependent on those guaranteed by the United States Constitution.”].)

122-123 [“Any law which goes beyond that principle, which undertakes to abolish rights, the exercise of which does not involve an infringement of the rights of others, or to limit the exercise of rights beyond what is necessary to provide for the public welfare and the general security, cannot be included in the police power of the government. It is a government usurpation, and violates the principles of abstract justice, as they have been developed under our republican institutions.”] (citations omitted)]; Ex parte Whitwell (1893) 98 Cal. 73, 79 [“If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the constitution.” (Citation omitted)]; Ex parte Newman (1858) 9 Cal. 502, 527 (dis. opn. of Field, J.) [“Men have an inalienable right of pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness, but subject to such restrictions as the public good may require.”]; see also Cal. Const. Art. 2, § 1 [“All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their protection, security, and benefit, and they have the right to alter or reform it when the public good may require” (emphasis added)].)

If the initiative process were to encompass the unlimited power to abrogate fundamental rights, article I, section 1, would be stripped of all meaning. (Cf., Billings v. Hall (1857) 7 Cal. 1, 17 (conc. opn. of Burnett, J.) [“[F]or the Constitution to declare a right inalienable, and at the same time leave the Legislature unlimited power over it, would be a contradiction in terms, an idle provision, proving that a Constitution was a mere parchment barrier, insufficient to protect the citizen, delusive and visionary, and the practical result of which would be to destroy, not conserve, the rights it vainly presumed to protect.”].)

The Court should give expression to the guarantees secured by article I, section 1 by evaluating whether the proposed initiative-amendment sufficiently furthers the public health, safety, or welfare. Mere majority support alone for the measure does not suffice. (See Citizens’ Savings & Loan Assn. v. City of Topeka, supra, 87 U.S. at p. 662, quoted above; see also Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2d ed.) 1311 [“[A]ttempts to ground constitutional rights of privacy or personhood in conventional morality . . . are helpful but have inherently limited power. For we are talking, necessarily, about rights of individuals or groups against the larger community, and against the majority – even an overwhelming majority – of the society as a whole. Subject to the perils of antimajoritarian judgment, courts – and all who take seriously their constitutional oaths – must ultimately define and defend rights against government in terms independent of consensus or majority will.”(Italics in original).])

Where fundamental rights and suspect classes are involved, “strict scrutiny” analysis is appropriate in order that the power of the initiative may be harmonized with the “inalienable” guarantees of article I, section 1. In this case, the Court has already concluded that the justifications advanced to support Family Code 308.5 were insufficient to justify denial of the right to marry to same-sex couples. (In re Marriage Cases, supra, 43 Cal.4th at pp. 848-856.) Given that the proponents chose simply to elevate the language of Family Code section 308.5 into the Constitution, and given that the proponents of Proposition 8 advanced no compelling need in furtherance of public health, safety, or welfare for abrogating the fundamental rights of same sex couples, the outcome should be no different here. For the reasons articulated in In re Marriage Cases, Proposition 8 should be stricken as inconsistent with the guarantees of individual liberty safeguarded by article I, section 1 of the Constitution.

CONCLUSION

The use of the initiative power to take away a legal right deemed by this Court to be fundamental and from a group defined by a suspect classification is a matter of grave concern. Existing precedents of this Court do not support the invalidation of Proposition 8 either as a revision or as a violation of the separation of powers. However, Proposition 8 should be invalidated as violating the inalienable right of liberty found in article I, section 1 of our Constitution.

Alternatively, if this Court finds the initiative constitutional, it should be narrowly construed to uphold the marriages that took place prior to the enactment of the initiative.
